Comments to the Author

This paper deals with a highly relevant topic, and presents some fascinating insights from an interesting case study in Sulawesi. Yet, I believe there is considerable scope for improvement, as per my remarks below.

First of all, the paper lacks a stated overall purpose: what does it want to achieve, what contribution to the debate on disaster mitigation does it want to make? Yes, it draws attention to the role of local wisdom in disaster mitigation, and it argues how this role is under threat from a variety of 'modern' forces, but for what purpose? What is the academic community concerned with these issues, supposed to learn from this study? Clarification of the purpose should also provide an argument for the selection of the case study, which is currently absent.

Second, the paper is very light on theory and conceptual development (in spite of an impressive amount of literature being referred to). We receive a single definition of 'local wisdom', but the other main concept – disaster mitigation – remains a black box. Unpacking of that multifaceted concept (disaster mitigation), in combination with a more elaborate and critical discussion of the concept of 'local wisdom', would allow for a more systematic, a more specific, and a more critical discussion in the empirical sections of how various types of local wisdom contribute (or not) to various stages or elements of disaster mitigation. In close connection, it would be good to also state which research questions have underpinned the empirical research.
